Globalization on the Ground: What Bolivia Teaches Us

Melissa Crane Draper, Editor, earned her Masters in International Relations at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies with a concentration in women's issues in development. A graduate of Dartmouth College, she worked for two years in grassroots organizations in Bolivia and also in rural Maharashtra, India. In 2005, she returned to Bolivia as an Earhart Fellow to work with The Democracy Center on issues of women and globalization in coordination. Melissa has lived in Bolivia for almost five years.

Roberto Fernández Terán, Contributor, is a professor at the Universidad Mayor de San Simon in Cochabamba. He has written extensively on issues of Bolivia's experiences with foreign economic policies, including his book, FMI, Banco Mundial y Estado Neocolonial (The IMF, the World Bank, and the Neocolonial State, Plural Press, 2003).

As the U.S. enters a new political era, what can we learn from one nation's battle to define its own way forward in a globalizing world?
