Killing Journalism: How Greed and Laziness (and Donald Trump) are Destroying News and How We Can Save It

Killing Journalism is an in-depth look at the real problems with today's news media -- from staff cutbacks and 24/7 demands for content to reduced advertising revenue, less support for press legal defense and fewer in-house watchdogs to keep the news fair and honest. Donald Trump's presidency has sparked attacks on the news media with his claims of "fake news" and his effort to turn the public against fair and free journalists, while also backing some of the most discredited news sources.

Joe Strupp '88, is an award-winning reporter with over 30 years experience in news media. Strupp's writing has appeared in MediaWeek, San Francisco magazine, NJ Biz, New Jersey Monthly, Salon.com and Poynter.org. He has interviewed the likes of Rupert Murdoch, George W. Bush, Ben Bradlee and O.J. Simpson and has been a commentator on Fox News, MSNBC, NPR, Voice of America, and Sirius XM Radio about media issues. While at Brooklyn College, Strupp majored in broadcast journalism and minored in business, and wrote for the school paper. He spent four years as a D.J., sportscaster, and newscaster at WBCR, Brooklyn College Radio.
