

American Studies is an interdisciplinary field that explores the diverse cultural and social life of the United States in local, national, and transnational contexts. We provide a space for students to discover varied perspectives on what it means to be American, drawing from faculty versed in literary criticism, history, musicology, art history, and ethnic and gender studies.

American Studies students are curious, critical thinkers who are encouraged to ask how social and cultural forces shape their own and others' identities, and their place in the larger mosaic of American society. In American Studies classes, you will engage in close analysis of immigrant novels, slave narratives, and the Constitution; conduct field work in your own communities; interview your neighbors to collect oral histories; and gain a deep understanding of U.S. history, society, and the arts from before Christopher Columbus to after President Barack Obama.

Why American Studies?

The flexibility of American Studies allows you to pursue your own particular interests and encourages unconventional thinking, while our core electives and individualized advising give your academic program coherence, balance, and depth. As an American Studies student, you will learn cutting-edge, critical methods for analyzing national, cultural, and individual identity, as well as explore questions of social justice, rights, and equality. Our aim is to help you see U.S. culture and the larger world in holistic ways, so you can articulate your own vision of citizenship and leadership. Our integrative approach to understanding American culture within and beyond national borders will prepare you to thrive in an increasingly complex and globally connected 21st-century world.

What can you do with an American Studies degree?

The inventive, interdisciplinary nature of American Studies throws open doors to a wide range of futures. American Studies graduates are creative, critical thinkers who go on to become writers, teachers, policy makers, lawyers, arts and museum administrators, editors, activists, and more. Surveys and research show that the key skills we teach—writing, communication, research, and critical problem-solving—are the ones employers are looking for, and will prepare you for long-term career success. Our graduates are change makers, working to shape American society and institutions in fields as diverse as the students themselves.
